The committee in charge of the matter of arranging for a parade during Old School and Home week in this city in June is busy preparing for the big event and has despatched invitations to every organization in the city which it is thought might care to participate in the parade. Up to date about 50 organizations have signified their willingness to join in the parade. The committee rightfully feels that a great part of the impression of a successful week which will be carried away by the visitors to Windham at that time will depend upon the monster parade, and they are urging everyone to aid.

Deputy Judge James N. Tucker of East Killingly is one of the few re-maining residents of this town who maining residents of this town who was a schoolmate at East Killingly of former United States Senator Nelson W. Aldrich of Rhode Island, who died at his New York home Friday.

Judge Tucker recalls with great clearness many of the incidents of Mr. Aldrich's schooldays on the hill and of the few years that he remained in that vicinity after going from the in that vicinity after going from the school. Nelson Aldrich was one of the older boys at the school, which in those days was so arranged as to those days was so arranged as to bring all grades into one room.

Judge Tucker characterizes Mr. Aidrich as a bright and earnest student from his earliest schooldays and mentions that even very early in life the boy, who afterwards came to be known as the general manager of the United States, constantly exhibited a trait that has often been held by his acquaintances as one of the paramount reasons for his wonderful success in life—an aggressiveness and a cess in life—an aggressiveness and a persistency that seemed to have no end in seeking to acquire an absolutely thorough understanding of every proposition that came to his attention. He always went to bedrock in his study of a subject, never being satisfied with superficial knowledge of matters that claimed his attention.

Judge Tucker remembers Mr. Aldrich as a clerk in a little country store at East Killingly, and also as a weaver for a time in what is known as the Ross mill, now occupied by the International Cotton company.

Senator Aldrich never lost his interest in East Killingly, where his father and mother are at rest in the village cemetery. His last formal visit there was about ten years ago, when he came as a guest at a public function. It was noted at the time he recalled many incidents of the years he spent in the village, remembered and recognized friends of those days, and found

Interest in Marriage License Bill. The bill relative to marriage licenses which it seems is about to be passed by the general assembly will make Putnam a Gretna Green again. One change in the resent law that is proposed is the abolishing of the require-ment of filing five days' notice on intent to marry, this applying to nonresidents of a town.

Previous to the enactment of the law that became effective on August 1-1913, Putnam was the Mecca for couples from Worcester county towns who were anxious to be married quietly, without a fuss or flurry—or or the sly. The insertion of the five days notice clause in the Connecticut law stopped all that, however, or stopped it to a considerable extent.
